Educational psychologists are mental health professionals who work with children and adolescents in educational settings. They help students with academic, behavioral, and emotional problems that can interfere with their learning. Educational psychologists also work with teachers and parents to help create a positive learning environment for all students.

What Do Educational Psychologists Do?

Educational psychologists provide a variety of services to children and adolescents, including:

- Assessing students' academic skills and abilities
- Diagnosing and treating learning disabilities and other academic problems

- Helping students with behavioral problems that interfere with their learning
- Providing counseling and support to students with emotional problems
- Working with teachers and parents to create a positive learning environment for all students

How to Become an Educational Psychologist

To become an educational psychologist, you must have a doctorate in educational psychology. Most educational psychology programs are accredited by the National Association of School Psychologists (NASP). To be accredited, a program must meet certain standards, including providing students with supervised field experience in educational settings.

The following are the steps you need to take to become an educational psychologist:

1. Earn a bachelor's degree in psychology or a related field.
2. Enroll in an accredited educational psychology program.
3. Complete a supervised field experience in an educational setting.
4. Graduate with a doctorate in educational psychology.
5. Obtain a license or certification from the state in which you plan to practice.

What to Expect in the Field

Educational psychologists work in a variety of settings, including schools, clinics, and hospitals. They may work with students of all ages, from preschool to college. Educational psychologists typically work full-time, and their hours may vary depending on the setting in which they work.

The job outlook for educational psychologists is expected to be good in the coming years. As the demand for mental health services continues to grow, educational psychologists will be in high demand to help students with academic, behavioral, and emotional problems.

If you are interested in a career helping children and adolescents learn and grow, then a career as an educational psychologist may be right for you. With a doctorate in educational psychology, you can work in a variety of settings to help students with academic, behavioral, and emotional problems.
